INTRODUCTION

The old Churchyard of Boharm is situated at Mansefield, less than a mile northeast of Maggie Knockater on the A95.

This Monumental Inscription record of the site was carried out during 2005 and 2006. The numbering system has been co-ordinated with that in use on the Moray Council LIBNDEX. Recording these M.I.'s, which date from the 17th century to the present day, is liable to have produced a few unavoidable errors. Therefore every care has been taken to eliminate transcription mistakes and typographical errors wherever possible, minimising the risk of them ending up in print. However, the researcher should where possible use the original text on the tombstone as a primary source.

The "Index" contains all surnames, even when used as a middle name, as these could indicate the surnames of parents or grandparents. Transcriptions of the entire text on each tombstone are exactly "as read," including masons' errors and the use of superscripts and subscripts. Where punctuation is used, this has only been edited where required in order to avoid misinterpretation and enhance readability. For ease of identification, all personal names are given in "Upper Case," while useful comments about individual tombstones, along with Monumental Masons' details, are included in Italics. The symbol 'f' as found on some older tombstones denotes the letter 's'.

North American readers should also note that the sequence of numbers given in numerical dates define these according to British usage, i.e. day – month – year.

ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

The Group wish to thank all concerned in the preparation of this publication. Tombstone transcriptions in the Old Churchyard were conducted by Helen and Keith Mitchell as members of the Moray Burial Ground Research Group. Special thanks are due to Dave McWilliam who initially made his own transcripts and photographs available for checking purposes as well as for all his additional help on site.

The history and published graveyard plans are the work of Bruce Bishop, while the indexing and editing have been undertaken by Bruce Bishop, Helen Mitchell and Keith Mitchell. Problematic post 1854 queries relating to the identification of specific names, dates and ages have been authenticated at New Register House in Edinburgh by Janet Bishop. A photographic archive of all tombstones has been compiled by Keith Mitchell. The photographic archive is indexed for use on the Moray Burial Ground Research Group website by Lindsay Robertson, while the cover illustrations and other photographs used in this book are by Keith Mitchell.

The History of the Church and Churchyard of Boharm

In pre-Reformation times there were three chapels in what is now the parish of Boharm. These were the chapel and hospital of St Nicholas at Boat of Brigg, the chapel at the Castle of Galival (Gauldwell), and also one at Artendol (Arndilly). It is possible that there was also a private chapel at Auchluncart. Following the Reformation, the chapel of St Nicholas was suppressed, its duties being taken over by nearby Dundurcas, and Galival, Arndilly and any possible place of worship at Auchluncart were also absorbed into the new parish of Boharm, now called Boharm.

The Chapel of St Nicholas “Ad receptionem Pauperum transcurrentium” – for the reception of poor travellers - at Boat of Brigg, was adjacent to a wooden bridge across the river at this point. Both the hospital and the bridge are mentioned in documents from 1232 and 1235, and survived the Reformation, the ruins being removed for the building of the new bridge in 1830. The chapel at this site probably formed the nucleus of a small parish, and there was a burial ground for the use of the hospital. This became a vegetable garden by 1870. There are now no traces of the hospital, chapel or burial ground other than a few roughly mortared stones which were visible during a survey in 1971 amongst the roots of a tree on the site.

The Chapel of Galival or Gauldwell was built at the castle, previously known as the Castle of Bucharn, sometime between the years 1203 and 1222. It was erected by William, the son of William Freskyn, who was given consent to build a domestic chapel, for the “more commodious performance of the offices of devotion” by Bricius, the Bishop of Moray. The building stood 50 yards from the north end of the castle and the internal dimensions were 24ft by 12ft, the chapel standing within its own consecrated burial ground. Again it is likely that in early times this became a small ‘parish’ unit, probably the original Bucharn parish. Lachlan Shaw¹ comments that “it is conjectured that (following the chapel of Arndilly falling into ruin) perhaps even before the Reformation, the chapel of the Castle of Buchairn at Galival became the place of worship for the whole parish”). The burial ground continued in use until about 1740, long after the castle and its chapel had fallen into disrepair.

The parish of Arndilly was centred on its own church, again with a consecrated burial ground, and continued as a parish until 1618. The chapel and burial ground later fell into disuse, but vestiges of the church and its burial ground remained visible until about 1760–1770. The new mansion house of Arndilly was built on the site, and during alterations to the house in 1965 about 20 skeletons, undated, were found lying orientated East to West, under the northern part of the house.

The first church of Boharm was built in 1618, at the private expense of King James VI as part of his attempts to ‘civilise’ the north of Scotland. This structure appears to have been erected in conjunction with the formation of the new parish by the incorporation of Arndilly and possibly also part of Dundurcas. Only the west gable remains intact, and a ‘modern’ mausoleum occupies the east end of the site. Traces of the footings of the old church are visible at the base of its south wall. According to Lachlan Shaw² writing sometime between 1760 and 1775 “The old church of Boharm is located on the summit of a beautifully wooded rocky ravine, in contrast with the site of its bald (sic) successor which, when erected, was unadorned by dyke, whin bush or tree. The belfry gable remains with its bell, which is only clinkit at the funerals of heritors or members of their family. The aul' kirkyard is shamefully kept, a few sheep being the conservative gardeners. An economical conjoint tomb divided by causway stones in the inside is set aside in a corner for the mortal remains of Auchluncart and Arndilly."

² ibid

In 1788 the part of the parish of Dundurcas which lay to the east of the Spey was annexed to the parish of Boharm, except for the lands of Aikenway, which together with its lands to the west of the river was annexed to Rothes. The second church on the site was built in 1793, and Leslie³, writing at about this time notes "of late a new church has been built, about three (two⁴) miles eastward from the old fabrick (no doubt referring to Galival or Gauldwell) in a situation pretty central to the present parish, where the glebe, about 30 acres, has been also allocated, and the residence henceforth fixed."

The 1793 church eventually fell out of use, and a new parish church was erected in the 19th century at Balnabreich near Mulben. This itself fell out of use in the mid 20th century, and is now used as a farm store. The Free Church at Mulben, also dating from the 19th century, is now a private residence. There were no burial grounds associated with either of these two churches.
